SOME THINGS PUBLIC MISSES AT SIX-DAY RACE.

All the time in the great bowl the riders swirl and swirl through the stale tobacco smoke. They have a weary air, but their legs pump up and down monotonously. Sitting beside the track, you hear them coming in a bunch. There is a rumbling sound as they roll by. A moment of silence—they are on the other side. Then the first comes into sight around the curve, the others close behind. Again the rumbling cound like that of a Subway train passing underneath you and they are gone. through the day curious people rift in through the gates, brave the grors of the stifling atmosphere, sit a while, and go out again. In the fternoon, when the crowd is good, the lders may wake up long enough to rrint a few furious laps. But they calm down. The excitement dies and the rumbling of the wheels alone disturbs the silence.

But at night, it is a different story Phrough the early evening crowds ooze through the galeway. By midnigh of smoke covers the battleleki-a haze that rises from thousand cigars, of thousands of different hour later the nearby Temlerioin has contributed its floating population Queens of the demimonde, weighted

In the excitement somebody tries to steal a pocketbook and either gets away with it or is hustled out. Yellow electric lights cover the tawdry colors with a softening haze. The rider clad half in sweaty woolen underwear and half in a shrunken circus costume looks as attractive as the fellow in silk with a ribbon floating behind him through the pall of smoke. The soot and grime of the morning hours have not yet begun to show. The teams are all strong. There is none of the wabbling, wavering riding of the days when each man stuck to his wheel until he fell and had to be carried off for a rest.

As a plain matter of fact, there is nothing about this six-day race, as we have it now, to excite the Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Animals. There are accidents now and then, but the mer who come and antimal targets. steal a pockerbook and either gens

The horses were frightened by the exclement and noise made as the field in the third race dashed by them. The coachman had a bet down on a horse in this finish he left the carriage, and was unable to overtake the runaway team, which was going at a full gallop. This is the first instance of the kind in history of a team and carriage going over the hurdles.

As a matter of fact, nothing funnier of this change, but on the whole it seems that it ought to be tried.
